

HURRICANES IN HONDURAS, AND ENRIQUE'S HARROWING TRIP

October included several days of “living at the margins of hurricanes” for Lyda Pierce and Paul Jeffrey, missionaries in Honduras. While the constant rain has been good for the trees and improves the country’s crop of basil, they write, “for some of the poor, it washes away houses and hope.”

Lyda and Paul recommend you catch the real story of Enrique, a young Honduran boy who is traveling north into Mexico in search of his mother. The Los Angeles Times is chronicling his harrowing travels in a series you can access at www.latimes.com/news/specials/enrique.

“We recommend (the series) highly,” writes Lyda. “The theme is of critical importance to churches here, which are struggling to figure out how to respond to the myriad issues raised by massive migration.”
